

This week we spoke about Time on the Daily Dish Show - the absolute preciousness of it and the realization that we need to cherish every moment of it - not just the pretty parts.

Yesterday I explained how what we see is determined by what we are looking for, and when we are cherishing our time it usually means we are looking for something different.

How do we take care of our time in such a way that we don't have regrets?

When a farmer looks at a field, he might see an opportunity for crops. When a botanist looks at the same field, she might see the wildflowers that are there. A geologist may see the potential for a dig and finding fossils. An artist might see the shades and colors that form the landscape. A hunter sees the wildlife. All of these people could stare at the same field and see completely different things because of their unique perspectives.

Similarly, we are all looking at the same thing, but we need to be able to see things from multiple perspectives.

PEARLS DON'T LIE ON THE

you must dive for it.*

What determines success and failure? Consistency and commitment are crucial, but so is the ability to see possibility. When you are looking for pearls instead of hoping that they show up on your shoreline, you find success.

Your perspective will serve as either your passion or your poison.

We become happy when we understand that we get to choose our pain - either the pain of following through or the pain of regret.

You can't wish what you want into existence any more than you can look for pearls on the beach.

As Patsy commented during the show, "No magic pill. It's Magic WILL!"

You have to do the work and PAY with PAIN. You can spend your life avoiding perceived pain, but you'll get that pain back in REGRET.

There is no reward without the struggle, and you can't just love the result - you have to love the process too! Loving the process is one of the biggest ways we can learn to cherish our time instead of dreading it--the process IS the journey!
